EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

As violent conflicts and humanitarian crises intensify globally, and especially in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA), communities are paying the price in the absence of political settlements and sustainable peace. Women, in particular, are severely impacted by these crises, but they remain mostly excluded from meaningfully participating in peace processes. This is despite overwhelming evidence showing that their involvement in peacebuilding and mediation contributes to lasting peace that goes well beyond just the silencing of guns.¹ The COVID-19 pandemic exposed even more starkly the extent of gender inequality in conflict-affected contexts, prompting ever-more urgent calls for inclusion.

In this context, UN Women convened the global conference ‘Gender-Inclusive Peace Processes: Strengthening Women’s Meaningful Participation through Constituency Building’ in July 2021, in partnership with CMI – Martti Ahtisaari Peace Foundation, and with financial support from the German Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation and Development (BMZ) in cooperation with Deutsche Gesellschaft für Internationale Zusammenarbeit (GIZ) GmbH and the Finnish Ministry for Foreign Affairs. The conference attracted the participation of more than 320 peace practitioners from 70 countries worldwide, with a focus on the MENA region. It was hosted completely online for the first time since its inception in 2018,² taking place over Zoom (live events, synchronous component) and SparkBlue (asynchronous engagement) platforms.

Discussions focused on how to leverage the practice of constituency building to foster inclusive peace and enhance women’s meaningful participation in formal peace processes.³ Scholars have found that one reason why women’s inclusion in peacebuilding is correlated with more durable agreements is because of the strong and extensive linkages that women signatories establish with constituencies of women’s civil society groups. Yet, for women leaders in particular, the practice of constituency building also brings about challenges, including the risk of being relegated to spaces generally perceived as women-only, and the assumption that one woman leader represents all women, or that women can represent “women’s issues” only.

A reconceptualization is necessary that considers women as equal political actors and that deepens the general understanding of the gendered dynamics of accountability and representation in contemporary peace processes.

With technical inputs and facilitation from experts and thought leaders, the conference offered a safe space for the sharing of experiences and cross-fertilization of ideas among practitioners with deep knowledge of different country contexts. Participants reflected, among other issues, on how to mitigate the increased security risks that women activists and politicians face for their participation in political processes—from being retaliated against for their activism to becoming the target of other political groups. They shared their perspectives on the opportunities and challenges of digital methods in constituency building, including the use of social media and digital tools to amplify women’s voices, and the heightened risks women can face as targets of hate speech and cyber harassment. Participants also discussed the ambivalent nature of temporary special measures (TSMs) and debated the efficacy of gender quotas as a long-term, transformative tool to shape societies, given their existing limitations in breaking the glass ceiling and meaningfully challenging gender-discriminatory cultural norms. Finally, participants pointed out that the best way to foster women’s meaningful inclusion is to ensure that women hold strategic leadership and decision-making roles.

² Previous convenings include “Women’s meaningful participation in peace processes: Modalities and strategies across tracks” (Geneva, 2018) and “Gender perspectives and confidence building for inclusive peace: Getting parties to a shared negotiation table through trust” (Tunis, 2019).

Building on the prior discussions and efforts of many others working to create feminist change in this space, these recommendations are intended to suggest further opportunities for coordination, prioritization, and strategic change and investment. Looking ahead to 2022 and beyond, and informed by the outcomes of the conference, UN Women and CMI will explore new areas of emphasis, including partnership building with mediation actors outside of the United Nations system. The vision going forward must be bold: the public health and humanitarian emergency brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic – particularly when considered in light of the 20th anniversary of United Nations Security Council resolution 1325 in 2020 – has highlighted how, now more than ever, transformative policy and practice shifts are needed in peacebuilding. With increasingly visible and powerful demands for women’s meaningful participation in peace processes, UN Women, CMI and their partners remain committed to protecting existing gains and contributing to further inclusive and holistic change.

Key overarching recommendations from participants

1. Leverage constituency building to foster inclusive peace
   Use and expand the practice of constituency building to increase women’s meaningful participation in peace processes, enhance their relevance and strengthen their resilience.

2. Build connections among women peace practitioners
   Create opportunities for women in Women, Peace and Security (WPS) with different expertise, and across different country contexts, to connect and exchange lessons learned, including through creating a database of women actors.

3. Strengthen alliances with local and global actors
   Consolidate women’s networks through building alliances at the regional and global levels, and through securing the buy-in of international actors for more inclusive peace.

4. Act on commitments to foster progress of the WPS agenda
   Move past the ‘talking for the sake of talking’ attitude and translate existing commitments and recommendations into action to further the WPS agenda.

5. Allocate sufficient funding, including civil society funding
   Earmark funding to specifically enable women representatives to engage with their constituencies.
